The Institute for Global Health Sciences Master of Science Program is searching for an educator to co-teach Global Health Sciences 201c, Qualitative Research Approaches in Global Health. The structure of the course includes lectures, small group discussions, interactive exercises, and written assignments. The course has been taught remotely for the last year but will resume as an in-person course when COVID restrictions are lifted. This course has always been co-taught due to the need for a lower student-faculty ratio in introductory methods courses. The two course directors split the lecturing and grading responsibilities evenly and work together in planning the course objectives and syllabus.

The ideal candidate will have had experience in research and education in applied qualitative methods with a global health focus. For the purposes of our program, we define global health to be international or domestic but with a focus on health equity. Previous teaching experience is preferred. In addition, IGHS Education is committed to supporting efforts to advance equitable access to education and outreach at all levels and as a result encourages and values applicants from diverse and underrepresented communities.

The course is taught in the fall quarter.* Expected course enrollment is 30-35 students. Two teaching assistants are provided for the course.

In addition to teaching responsibilities, all faculty in the MS in Global Health Sciences are required to serve as academic advisors for approximately 2-3 students per year and as capstone project readers for another 2-3 students per year. Faculty who lead IGHS methods courses may also occasionally serve as secondary mentors to students whose capstone projects would benefit from additional methods expertise. Faculty are required to attend quarterly faculty meetings, a yearly retreat, and qualifying and comprehensive exams. All faculty receive student evaluations and program reviews yearly.

The position of Course Associate Director is not offered as a campus faculty appointment and as a result is open to candidates already employed in the UC system. The selected Course Associate Director will receive a stipend of up to $23,000 for the quarter.

The Master of Science in Global Health is a one-year, four-quarter program designed for those who wish to acquire expertise and develop leadership skills in the field of global health. Graduates are prepared for careers in research, policy, organizational leadership, program management and evaluation, and academia.
